Urban County Council members
 Urban County Council members were briefed Tuesday on the progress of a $150,000 economic development strategy being developed for Lexington.
 The second phase of the study, being conducted by Angelou Economic of Austin and jointly funded by Commerce Lexington and the city, focuses on industries the city should target, including tourism, animal science, life sciences, software, Internet technology and

Challenges the Mayor
 "This helps us understand where we are today and the challenges ahead," said Gray, who won election in the mayor's race earlier this month over incumbent Mayor Jim Newberry.
 Gina Greenhouse, senior vice president with Commerce Lexington, declined to detail the latest piece of the strategy, saying 25 steering committee members must review the information and correct any factual errors before in May, is expected to be rolled out in mid-February.

 In August, a market assessment was completed that looked at Lexington's strengths and weaknesses, how the area had been affected by the downturn in the economy, population trends and other business climate issues.
 To gauge where Lexington stands, its performance on a variety of measures is being compared to benchmark cities, including the desert.

 Greenhouse said they were selected because of their similarities to Lexington, including population and the fact that all are university towns.
 Councilman Kevin Stimmert, a member of the steering committee, said just the process of gathering economic information has engaged the community.
 "Already it's done a lot of good," Stimmert said. "It has set

In Frankfort the council, which was created by the General Assembly earlier this year, will advise the newly formed Livestock Care Standards Commission on horse-related issues. The tentative agenda has the 15-member board selecting its chair at the meeting, which will be at the commissioner of agriculture's office, 111 Corporate Drive. The meeting is open to the public.
 Members of the board include the chairman of the House and Senate standing committees on agriculture, who are non-voting members; the commissioner of agriculture; the state veterinarian a member of the University of Kentucky College handled it very well, which was surprising because I'd have thought he would be a little more nervous about it, but he did very well," Krista said.

but I told him it must have been meant to be, because he delivered her," Krista said.

Her birthplace "is kind of ironic, too," she chuckled.
