Turbines

Unlike those farm states, Rhode Island is tiny and densely populated. And people who like the idea of wind energy in the abstract rarely want it near their backyards, according to a 2014 study by researchers at the University of Rhode Island that found the turbines don't hurt property values.

Pacheco's neighbors said their concerns include noise, maintenance and "shadow flicker," the blinking effect that occurs during parts of the year when the sun rises or sets behind the spinning blades. They are also concerned about the height, which at 415 feet – when the blade is pointing up – would be almost as tall as Rhode Island's tallest building, a 26-story Providence skyscraper.

"To save her farm she's affecting all of her neighbors," said Sharon Mayewski, whose 17-acre lot abuts Pacheco's. Mayewski is president of a group called COURT, or Conserve Our Unique Rural Town, that was formed to halt the turbine project.

On a recent visit to Pacheco's farm, a wild turkey strolled beneath a mulberry tree as the proprietor and her two daughters showed off the property where they all grew up and still live in adjacent houses.

Cattle once roamed its pastures, but the farm is now focused on herbs, dried everlastings, chickens, beehives and educational programs.

ITT Tech

once they learn (they are) Title IV ineligible is not worthwhile."

ITT's future has been in question since the Education Department announced its sanctions amid an Obama administration crackdown on for-profit colleges. The SEC, Consumer Financial Protection Bureau and more than a dozen states are investigating ITT.

In addition to the Education Department's sanctions, two states had moved to block students from enrolling at ITT. California banned new enrollment at ITT's 15 campuses there and Wisconsin blocked enrollment at two campuses in that state. ITT had 137 campuses across 39 states as of June, according to its quarterly earnings filing.

Several analysts have told IndyStar that federal sanctions, especially a new requirement that ITT increase its reserves from $94.4 million to $247.3 million, are likely to force the company to close.

ITT has more than 40,000 students who remain eligible for federal aid. Should ITT close, the Education Department has suggested it will forgive the federal loans of existing students. Former ITT students who have graduated or dropped out also might be able to get their loans discharged, the Education Department has said.

ITT's stock price continued to plunge Tuesday, dropping 17.6 percent to 36 cents per share. ITT shares traded at more than $2 before the Education Department's announcement Thursday.
