Preventive maintenance at the power plants

Regular maintenance of power plants is a key to keeping the lights on, says Craig Johnson, East Kentucky Power Cooperative's senior vice president of power production. Every year, one at a time, every generating unit in every power plant goes through a maintenance outage—kind of like an oil change for your car, says Johnson. Every 10 years there's a larger planned outage, which Johnson says is more like overhauling your engine. This photo shows a worker during one of those major outages. A team removed the generator field rotor from the #2 unit at the Hugh L. Spurlock Station near Maysville. Johnson says a major maintenance outage like this one last year can be two years in the planning, with every minute of the 24/7 job carefully choreographed. "We don't like to run things to failure," Johnson says. "We like to catch it before failure."
