Facebook ads discriminate, HUD says

Mike Snider
USA TODAY

The Department of Housing and Urban Development has charged Facebook with "discriminatory" advertising practices, alleging that the social network prevents advertisers from reaching a broad swath of buyers.

Facebook's advertising platform uses data and machine learning that allows landlords, developers and other housing providers to target certain desired users, the Housing Department alleges, which discriminates against other users on the base of race, color, national origin, religion, familial status, sex and disability.

"Facebook is discriminating against people based upon who they are and where they live," HUD Secretary Ben Carson said. "Using a computer to limit a person's housing choices can be just as discriminatory as slamming a door in someone's face."

The social network's practices violate The Fair Housing Act, HUD charges, by allowing advertisers to exclude Facebook users who are parents, not born in the U.S., and those interested in a wide variety of topics including for example, accessibility or Hispanic culture.

These interests "closely align" with the housing act's protected classes, HUD says.

Facebook also allowed advertisers

Facebook says it had worked on its advertising with the U.S. Department of Housing and Urban Development.

JOSH EDELSON/AFP/GETTY IMAGES to exclude those who see their ads based on neighborhoods, as well as to show ads to only men or only women, the agency said.

HUD and the Justice Department filed an administrative complaint regarding the allegations in August 2018, in the U.S. District Court for the Southern District of New York.

An administrative law judge will now hear regulators' charges, unless Facebook wants the case heard in federal court.

The law judge could award damages if it's determined discrimination occurred.

Facebook, in a statement to USA TODAY, said it was surprised by the regulators' decision to move forward.

"We've been working with (HUD) to address their concerns and have taken significant steps to prevent ads discrimination," the company said. "Last year we eliminated thousands of targeting options that could potentially be misused, and just last week we reached historic agreements with the National Fair Housing Alliance, ACLU, and others that change the way housing, credit, and employment ads can be run on Facebook."

The social network was "eager to find a solution," it says, but regulators had "insisted on access to sensitive information – like user data – without adequate safeguards," as part of the process, Facebook said.

"We're disappointed by today's developments, but we'll continue working with civil rights experts on these issues."

Facebook and President Donald Trump have not been on friendly terms recently.

Last week, the president tweeted that "Facebook, Google and Twitter, not to mention the Corrupt Media, are soo on the side of the Radical Left Democrats."

Also last week, the social network had to apologize to the White House's social media director for blocking his Facebook page.
