DETROIT – U.S. Energy Secretary Jennifer Granholm said Tuesday the department is working "as fast as we can" to finalize $1.7 billion in grants to fund the conversion of plants to build electric vehicles and components.

"We are working as fast as we can to finalize as much as we can – to get the commitments in contract with all of those who have been selected," Granholm said in an interview on the sidelines of a Reuters Next conference. "We have a few months to make sure that we're doing that."

DOE announced plans in July to award General Motors to convert its Lansing Grand River Assembly Plant in Michigan to EVs at an unspecified future date and to award Chrysler-parent Stellantis $334.8 million to convert its shuttered Belvidere Assembly plant to build EVs and $250 million to convert its Indiana Transmission Plant in Kokomo to produce EV components. The United Auto Workers has threatened strikes over Stellantis delays in the planned Belvidere investment, which has prompted Stellantis to file suits to prevent work stoppages. Asked about the delay, Granholm said "there's a whole array of considerations with respect to that and we are in conversation about it."

Earlier this month, UAW President Shawn Fain said hundreds of thousands of U.S. jobs were at stake if Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump won the Nov. 5 election and made good on his threat to repeal investments in electric vehicles. Democrats have seized on Trump's running mate, Sen. JD Vance of Ohio, declining to commit to maintaining the $500 million GM grant.

A GM spokesperson said it is "still in the negotiation phase of the grant" and declined to forecast what might happen if the grant was not approved.

Granholm at the conference said the Biden administration's industrial strategy to ensure next-generation vehicle production compared with prior efforts. "This time, United States government is not effing around," she said.

The administration is helping automakers "cut costs and secure supply chains and innovate new technologies and help you be globally competitive," Granholm said.

Walmart announces quick delivery of prescriptions

Walmart announced it will now deliver prescription medicines and medication refills as a single order along with groceries and other items as soon as 30 minutes, as part of its new express delivery option.

The retail bellwether's latest move comes a couple of weeks after technology giant Amazon.com announced its plans to open pharmacies with same-day delivery options across 20 new U.S. cities in 2025.

Walmart's previous efforts to dispatch prescription medications typically took at least five to seven business days, while an overnight delivery upon request was charged an additional $15.

The company, which has nearly 4,600 store locations with pharmacies, said the new delivery option is available in six states: Arkansas, Missouri, New York, Nevada, South Carolina and Wisconsin.

It would be delivering in 49 states by the end of January next year.

Walmart Plus members will receive free delivery, while nonmembers will have to pay a standard charge of $9.95.

The retailer added customers have the option to choose on-demand or express delivery, where the items would be available as soon as 30 minutes, or same-day delivery, where the order can be scheduled for a specific time.

"Customers will be able to seamlessly add prescriptions along with other items from their local Walmart in a single order, available both in-app and online," the company said.

It will offer all medications except controlled substances, those that need refrigeration and Medicare Part B items that cover services such as outpatient care.

Healthcare firm CVS Health offers free same-day delivery to customers with its membership program, CarePass.

Pharmacy chain Walgreens offers 24-hour delivery along with groceries and over-the-counter medications, among other items.

Earlier this year, Walmart said it would close all 51 of its health clinics and its virtual healthcare operations, as it did not see the business model as sustainable to continue.
