"We want kids to be successful in their future. We focus on communication, civic engagement, getting involved in their community and leadership skills as well."

One of the many young adults involved in 4-H is Brooklyn Hunt, who has a passion for the Natural Resources Club. Hunt spent much of the morning and early afternoon talking with interested passersby about the organization's involvement with the Kentucky Watershed Watch.

Her 56-page leaf collection and her brothers' etymology collection were also stars of the show, with Hunt discussing her favorite leaves and most difficult finds. However, through it all Hunt said she was excited to see so many people show an interest in one of her many passions.

"I have to say that it is always been really fun, especially when we work with the Watershed Watch and Stream Team," she said of the club. "To just go out in streams and look for the macro invertebrates. You can find them and identify them. It's always been really fun."

Elizabeth Kaumf shared her experience with 4-H Helping Hands Club, which is the organization's only service-based group. She said for the last three years she has been a member, knowing the impact their acts of services bring to various groups throughout the county. When it comes to bringing in new members, Kaumf encourages them to be interested and give it a try.

"There are programs for them to become interested in something and then become passionate about something," Klotz said. "Then they get that progressive experience, to learn more advanced skills and then even potentially pursue a career in that specific interest area. That is the main goal. 4-H is allowing kids to be passionate about something and grow their leadership skills through those programs."

day's carnival allowed all ages of the community to learn of programs and organizations they can be apart of; whether to explore new interests and hobbies or create a new social group.

The Nelson County Homemakers had their booth set up Saturday, showcasing their many projects through the community and their numerous volunteer hours. Julie Bradford, former Homemakers President, said the organization offers various classes for community members and spent more than 27,000 hours volunteering from Nelson County.

"People think of homemakers as old ladies who just bake — that's not true," she said. "We are not only cookie makers, which we do make cookies, but we're decision makers. Homemakers, we have run homes. We have done other jobs too. We're very, I think, important in our community. We do a lot of volunteer work. ... We do have some crafts. We have some beautiful things going on with classes coming up that the cultural arts have set up."

Stanfield recreated Pyle's famous desk setup in the war-era communications tent. Accompanying the re-enactment was a small history on Pyle highlighting his work and dedication to the soldiers, telling the stories of the people fighting in the conflict.

"He always had his little Jeep hat on, and he was a really small guy, so everybody knew who he was when they saw him," Stanfield said of Pyle. "He would write about the soldiers. I mean, a lot of people write about the guys in the planes and this and that. He liked writing about the infantry guys, guys who were in the mud, and what they did and all that. Relive their lives and let the people back home know what they were doing."

John Crabtree, another member of the Baker Company, said they portray the infantry to keep alive the memory of those who served. He said in 2024 there are very few surviving World War II veterans, as many continue to be lost to time. In their portrayal, Crabtree said they are able to share the history of the past with the younger generations of today honoring their sacrifices.

"Our thing is to preserve history, because we're losing our D-Day veterans," Crabtree said. "... They're all in their late 90s. The population of today, the younger population, needs to understand the sacrifices they went through in order to not only keep our country free, but liberate other portions of the world from tyranny. We want to make sure we foster what they did of giving us a free world, and make sure they're not forgotten."
